Audience Cheers Singers Performing Without Orchestra, Music, Scenery or Costumes

by Charles B. Ryan

Meeting the emergency of presenting Giacomo Puccini’s opera, “Faust,” with a small ensemble of six singers and an orchestra of five, the Opera-Orchestra Company completely won its battle at Municipal Auditorium.

There was a truce of musical sympathy between the star tenor and the audience after the feeble opening of the opera, which was prevent- ed from being present without orchestra, music, scenery or costumes by the exigencies of the present state of affairs.

The tenor, headed by Josephine O’Hara, was heard by the audience, which was won over by the straightforwardness of the performance.

The opera was presented without orchestra, music, scenery or costumes, except for the light of the electric light at Municipal Auditorium.
